But when they profetioire, it can be rather shocking. When very young children swear, it is usually a matter of repeating the things they heard. They are just learning to use the language to communicate, so as to imitate any word they can. They are not trying to hurt or offend anyone, they are only developing verbal skills. Older children swear for a number of reasons. If you are a word they don't often feel, they can use it because they don't realize that it is offensive. They could just think that it is a new fresh word to try. When adults say words they swear that tend to emphasize them, which makes them all more attractive to young people. Children can also use sworn words in an effort to get attention. As a parent, it usually takes us by surprise when our children use this language. It is not easy to ignore it, especially when it comes out of the blue. So we get angry, or maybe we laugh. In both cases, the child receives attention. Our children take on this, and the next time they are wishing to attention, they remember the word He drew attention first. Unfortunately, this often happens in the most inappropriate periods, such as when you wait in a busy checkout line at the supermarket. When children grow old, they often begin to understand that curse words are seen as offensive. that is why many children swear when they are young to stopduring kindergarten or primary years. But some keep those sworn words stored for future use. They take them out when they feel frustrated or want to hurt others. And there are boys who use cursed words just to show in front of their peers. Where do they learn clothing words? Children learn to swear words from a variety of sources. And as far as we do not want to admit it, one of the main places that hear these words is at home. Even parents who do their best to not swear in public often swear at home. Even if it only happens when you hit the foot, your baby is likely to take it. Children can also hear sworn words on TV and movies. Many cartoons also contain the language that we would not want our children to use, if not curse words. This is another reason why it is important to monitor the things our children look at. Even the most repaired child is destined to hear a sworn word at some point. If you're lucky, he'll never say it again. But the fact is that most children use a curse word at some point. If you take it with your hands, you'll never feel it again. And if you do, a calm explanation of why it is inappropriate may nip your child swearing in the sprout. What to do when children start the curve Some parents carefully watch every word coming out of the mouth. Others let a curse word slip from time to time. But no matter which category you will fall, hearing your child's curse is not a pleasant experience. If you find it funny or disturbing, the last thing you want is that your son says a word oath at the wrong time. And most parents agree that swearing is a horrible and offensive habit that they don't want their children to develop. So what do you do when your son starts healing? Here are some tips. Don't overdo it. If you make a great scene when the child pronounces a dirty word, there is a good chance that will strengthen behavior. It could use the word again when you want to attract attention, or it could decide that it is a good word to use when you want under the skin. Do your best not to laugh. If you really find it funny or simply giggle nervously, this could also cause a repeat. Your son will see that he made you laugh, and he could use the same word again when he wants to be fun. Avoid facing your child to swear when he does it when angry or upset. This will add fuel to the fire only in most cases. Work through the problem at hand, and discuss the bad language at a calmer time. Look closer to your tongue. Children often take curse words at home, and if you use them frequently, they are more likely to think it isDo it yourself. Take into consideration the age of your child. Kids who are just learning to speak usually don't realize that sworn words are bad. So scolding them when using them serves little purpose. In many cases, if you just ignore it, they won't say it again. If your child has a more developed language A calm and simple explanation of why they should not swear often solve the problem. If you tell them a word is not nice, there's a good chance they'll stop using it. Life children who know that sworn words are harmful may have to be disciplined when they use them. Depending on age and circumstances, time, suspension of certain privileges or grounding may be appropriate. Support the context of the word without words. Calling someone a bad name is much more painful than oath because you took and fell. Both should be discouraged, but make sure the punishment fits the crime. When you slide and say a damn word, apologize. This will take a good example for your child. He'll take more acceptable options to swear. There are many words in English that are not so offensive. You could even encourage your child to form his stupid expressions to use instead of cursed words. These days, a few children cross childhood without saying a cursed word. When your baby swears, don't take it too strong. As long as you clarify that such words are unacceptable, the possibilities of your little angel developing an incurable mouth are very thin.
